St. Louis what is styled "the world's largest business building" is about to be opened. It has twenty- Mathews-McCulloch Co., under First one stories, with an area of 65,000 square feet for each floor. It is light and airy, and evidently well constructed, and no doubt it is in all par ticulars adequate to the commercial uses to which it will be put. But it 1885. is abominally ugly. Each facade presents the appearance of an enormous vertical MONEY to loan on real estate securcucumber frame of multitudinous win-There is not a single visible housekeeping attempt at adornment, not a curvil linear effect of any sort to relieve the rows and rows of squares and oblongs and gaunt upright parallels.

> By way of striking contrast, take the new Woolworth building, which dominates Manhattan island with an upsoaring shaft of stone that answers to Mme, de Stael's famous definition of architecture as frozen music. This s a building at once useful and beautiful. It nobly asserts above Broadway its spiritual inspiration, just as Trinity church stands at the head of the rush minaret and muezzin call. When such results are feasible, what is the excuse for uglifying a downtown city block with the bideous angularity of such a structure as that upreared in the metropolis of the Mississippi valley? In every American city today there are increasingly abundant examples of the way to examples of the way to bulld great houses of business that blend the practical and the inspirational values. Philadelphia has a goodly proportion of such ornamental edifices, in which thought was altruistically taken for the improvement of an entire neighborhood.
